How do these situations relate to YOU?

- After being constantly asked for identification at the bank where he's done business for 10 years, Bill explodes with irritation. The teller curtly replies, "Everyone is required to show ID; that's our policy." Bill replies, just as curtly, "Close my account. Now."
- Janice receives another incorrect billing for a subscription she'd ordered. After being put on hold and transferred twice, she decides against the subscription, hangs up and throws the bill away. "What happened to that call?" the receptionist wonders. "It just disappeared."
- Mark telephones a supplier to find out why a shipment of parts is overdue. He can't reach his sales representative, and an exasperated inventory clerk tells him, "All I can tell you is that they were shipped two weeks ago! I don't know any more than that!" Mark makes a firm decision against ordering from this company again.

The moral of these stories:

Despite good intentions, the customer was lost. Every person in the organization — even those you may not think of as customer service personnel — has the ability to make a positive impact on customer relations.
